Program Description

The Princeton Review offers individualized, small, and large group tutoring to eligible students in pre-kindergarten through grade 12. Small class sizes with motivated, qualified teachers build reading and math skills quickly. We work with each district to create a program that meets their specific needs and those of their parents and students. Whether it's before school, after school, on weekends, or during the summer, we provide 30-45 hours of tutoring in math, reading, or both subjects using our proprietary, research-based curricula for students from pre-K to high school. We provide on-site personnel to oversee students signing-in, the distribution of snacks, quality classroom instruction, and student dismissal. Our teachers are thoroughly trained on our curriculum, classroom management, and the documentation of every minute of a student's time in the program. Support staff audits attendance records and creates daily reports on our programs. Parents are encouraged to participate in their child's education. We provide tools, support, and opportunities to engage their children in learning outside the SES classroom. School and district staff receive custom reports and copies of an individualized learning plan created for each student in DC standard language. We meet with school and district administration regularly to update them on our programs and on student achievement. End-of-program reports summarize our efforts and document student achievement. Classes are usually held in the child's school and we encourage parent involvement. Motivating and engaging materials combine with fun activities for a positive learning experience.
